Incidence of nausea and vomiting in postoperative day 1 after pediatric cardiac surgery: incidence and correlation with opioid use. The objectives of this study were to measure the incidence of postoperative nausea and vomiting (PONV) on postoperative day 1 (POD 1) after pediatric cardiac surgery and to determine whether the use of opioids (PO) is correlated with PONV on POD 1. This was a retrospective cohort study in which patients were grouped based on PO use in the POD 1 anesthesia. Patients were excluded if they were younger than one year, had extracorporeal circulation, had a high-risk PONV score on POD 0, had incomplete medical records, or if they were not on PO therapy on POD 0. A total of 97 patients were included for analysis, of whom 67 were nonopioid and 30 were opioid group. The incidence of PONV on POD 1 was 24.6%. The incidence of PONV was statistically significantly higher in the opioid group ($P = .003$). Patients in the opioid group had a longer PACU time (9.8 vs 4.9 hours, $P = .03$), but no difference in time to extubation or discharge. The use of opioids was correlated with an increased incidence of PONV on POD 1 ($P = .03$) and in general was not associated with increased morbidity. The use of opioids on POD 0 may be associated with a higher incidence of PONV on
