I'm using SpringBoot with ZK. My application sends data to ZK server as a POST request, this data is stored on the ZK server. When my application send another POST request, the received data is stored on the ZK server too. This is because the received request is a POST. My question is, how does ZK know that the same data is sent in the second request? I thought the answer is, zkf.local.receive method, but it seems not to be the case. How does zk know that the data is the same data when the sent request is a POST request? A: It makes sense that the same data is stored because the sent data is identical to the data of the received request: The server uses the ZKClient API method zk.local.getData() to retrieve the received data and that's how ZK identifies that the data is the same. The ZKClient API method zk.local.putData() (which is invoked in the zk.local.receive() method) uses ZKServerProxies to update the data (or delete the data if there was none). If you don't specify the server, ZKClient assumes that the data matches the server node. Note that if you used PUT or DELETE instead of POST, a new, unique node would be created and the data would not be stored in the original node. I am not sure why you are questioning things that you do not understand as many health conditions are usually brought on by a lifestyle. Is the reason you have questions because you feel bad? If you feel bad its time to do some research. I would be more
